

Ego of Intelligence

The eternal Void has offered us a blank white canvas of huge spiritual currency wishing us to pick up the pallets judiciously. He has put his bona fide trust upon us. If not, then what other reasons may there be for being taken care of by nature with such a whopping allegiance and imposing love? Do we deserve the services of the sun, the moon, the earth, and the air - every second, every moment? There's nothing important enough inside us to warrant the services of Mother Nature, except for the reason that Ultimate loves us unmerited and out of His sweet whim and kindness has thought us to be special. We should never let disquiet take the better of us. We should not allow the uproar within us, which is nothing but only a design from our past, to bully us. The state of agitation may appear legitimate to us on a superficial level, but after deep insightful authentication we will find it as ignoble and unworthy. We need to be firm, and bold and remain illuminated. What may appear impossible to us, is important to the Absolute. It is at this moment that we accept the challenge to show our love for the Ultimate. For those who have dedicated and directed themselves absolutely toward a spiritual cause, and to the colossal tower of absolute spiritual authority out of the darkness galore.

We all experience those intense, poignant moments in life that compel us to question the very purpose of our existence, in the darkness galore when we are confused, frightened, and in much pain. These events or situations beg us to review the philosophy and motivation of our life. They have a seismic effect that shakes the foundations of our belief system, convictions, and comprehension of the world that we live in. These moments are often consequent to some form of disillusionment, a sudden realization of the 'bitter' truths of life, an unexpected tragedy, or misfortune. They numb our sensitivity, and sensibility, throwing our minds into total disarray. These moments are not just transient, trifling disappointments or frustrations, but more. Responses to such situations are varied and often include seeking recourse and relief in some institution of faith or seeking refuge in prayer as a way of providing succor to the distraught mind. They serve to deal a body, blow to the ego, and coerce surrender of doer-ship. For a few, these moments trigger a process of inflection and introspection that redirects seeking from without to within.

External agencies and remedies like spiritual texts and religious rituals have limitations and are at best palliative. The cure lies in a radical transformation, a psychological makeover that permanently alters the way we perceive ourselves and the outer world. A regular culture of spiritual knowledge helps in sparking off an extraordinary spiritual sojourn that can ignite inside us an overwhelming desire to transcend the transience of all that is temporary, superficial, and shallow, be it the religious texts or the spiritual dogmas, and rise up to the zone of absolute permanence. The mind needs to be silenced along with a total deconstruction of concepts, impressions, and beliefs. The 'Trans-Conceptual' can never be accessible to the concept in any form. All sensory modalities are slaves of tangibility. They are incapable of perceiving the 'Formless, Attribute-less, Intangible Self'. Doubts, questions, seeking, exploring – all these faculties are predicates of duality. They are victims of intelligence, shackled by a cause-effect paradigm in the confines of a spatiotemporal matrix.

Causality is the ego of intelligence, and our ego is that image of ourselves that is most toxic in the sense that it thrives merely on social approval and lives in fear of losing that pro power we draw from societal acknowledgments. Being hostage to our toxic ego we often fail to see the deeper truth, a sublime truth from a higher source more recognizable by our heart than our head. Isn't it always more profitable and rewarding to be host to our Absolute Consciousness than to be hostage to our ego? Nothing can be more rewarding and powerful than the power of surrender to the Absolute, and for the surrender and submission to be complete our ego needs a total fade away from our dense cloak of ignorance and reveal the light of eternal awareness within.
