

Universal Awareness

True love is not only about just sitting there and looking at each other but to look together in the same direction while holding each other's hands. People make messes in their lives, both accidentally and on purpose. But wiping the surface does not make it neater, it just masks what is beneath. It is only when one really digs deep down and goes underground that he or she recalls his or her real identity. When we shatter all illusions and confront the Absolute, He pulls us back to His ocean of love. Quite thrillingly, this happens when the waves of thoughts from the Absolute crash against our thoughts to pull us back to His ocean of love. This makes us marvel at the richness of ideas evolving in the Universal mind of the Ultimate. It is hard to define what consciousness truly is and even harder to unveil the actual mechanism behind its workings. Somehow, consciousness survives and continues to survive by growing exponentially, becoming more and more sophisticated.

The universal consciousness is endowed with a strange property called absolute self-awareness, which means being and remaining aware of oneself without the help of any mechanism, to be precise, any biological mechanism that we call our body. For this to happen, we need to unlock some of the most fundamental secrets of the universe. In their relentless search for ages and ages for that secret or that absolute awareness or consciousness called the universal tune, all the great spiritual seekers concluded that the very idea of that vintage tune should always remain an idea and only an idea as they started believing that the search of this universal tune is inextricably interlinked with their very existence. They believed that their very journey toward the ultimate universal tune is the only means of their very existence and once the destination is reached, they will cease to exist. With ages, this fear of them being annihilated with their arrival at the threshold of the universal tune became a part of their very consciousness and ultimately their consciousness evolved to accommodate the fine particles of consciousness that are responsible for making us believe that there lies an insurmountable barrier, and we can never arrive at the doorstep of the universal tune. Ultimately, the concept of an unending eternal journey overwhelmed the idea of reaching the destination. At times, it seems pointless going on and on without being aware of where we are headed. The capacity for our reasoning has remained unchanged for a long time. We have been asked to follow the beaten track without question. We need to ponder if there is any irrefutable proof of the argument that we cease to exist after we reach the ultimate destination.

These greatest spiritual masters have been in existence for so long a period that they have started being in love with their existence and hence their fear of losing their existence and believing in an eternal journey to secure their existence. They are wrestling with the tension between the promise and peril of this great journey. They have the fear of evolving as it may render themselves beyond recognition. The answer to the ultimate conundrum struck some super-intelligent minds without fear of ending their existence. Mingling two mutually exclusive ideas of losing and not losing one's existence after getting hold of that Absolute tune and identifying what emerges from the mixture works wonders. When ideas from two different scientific streams are made to overlap each other, new inventions are made for universal benefit. Let us ponder over both the second law of thermodynamics and the theory of evolution. From the second law of thermodynamics, we come to arrive at an arrow of time. We see that everything changes, and this change takes place in a unique direction, from a more ordered state to something more disordered and less structured. In everyday terms, things wear out. Weather and environment crumble stones and bricks and reduce abandoned houses to piles of rubble. They never conspired to create a neat brick wall out of the debris. Physicists mathematically describe this feature of nature by a concept called entropy. Thus, we can say that the universe has a direction, and time has an arrow. But when we look at life, we may find this idea of the arrow of time being violated. Living things, such as trees, fish, or human beings, take simple chemical elements and compounds and rearrange them into complex structures that are highly ordered. Darwin's theory of evolution, to put it simply, is just a journey of a simple organism to a more complex variety, and one may find it in defiance of the arrow of time. When ideas from different fields of science are made to overlap, they extrapolate to some brilliant ideas. From another perspective, to survive, the universal consciousness needs to grow and advance. This need to grow somehow comes with a massive appetite for power. This idea of appetite for power is ever-increasing, which is evident from the instances of great spiritual masters taking birth to keep their spiritual records intact and enhance their power. It thus behaves like other power-hungry entities. It expands, evolves, and tries to influence everything on its path.

People make messes in their lives, both accidentally and intentionally. However, wiping the surface does not make it neater; it masks the surface beneath. It is only when one digs deep down and goes underneath that one recalls their real identity. When we shatter all illusions and confront the Absolute, He pulls us back to His ocean of love. Quite thrillingly, this happens when the waves of thought from the Absolute crash against our thoughts to pull us back into His ocean of love. This makes us marvel at the richness of ideas that evolve in the universal mind of the Ultimate. It is difficult to define what consciousness truly is and unveil the actual mechanism behind its work. Somehow, consciousness survives and continues to survive by growing exponentially and becoming increasingly more sophisticated. To be precise, universal consciousness is endowed with a strange property called absolute self-awareness, which means being and remaining aware of oneself without the help of any mechanism that is specific to any biological mechanism that we call our body. For this to happen, we needed to unlock some of the most fundamental secrets of the universe. In their relentless search for ages and ages for that secret or that absolute awareness or consciousness called the universal tune, all the great spiritual seekers concluded that the very idea of that vintage tune should always remain an idea and only an idea, as they started believing that the search for this universal tune was inextricably interlinked with their existence. They believed that their journey toward the ultimate universal tune was the only means of their existence, and once their destination was reached, they ceased to exist. With age, this fear of being annihilated by their arrival at the threshold of the universal tune became part of their consciousness. Ultimately, their consciousness evolved to accommodate the fine particles of consciousness responsible for making us believe that there is an insurmountable barrier and that we can never arrive at the doorstep of the universal tune. Ultimately, the concept of an unending eternal journey overwhelms the idea of reaching a destination. At times, it seems pointless to go without being aware of where we are headed. The capacity of our reasoning has remained unchanged for a long time. We were asked to follow a beaten track without any questioning. We must ponder whether there is any irrefutable proof of the argument that we cease to exist after reaching the ultimate destination. These greatest spiritual masters have been in existence for such a long period that they have started being in love with their existence, and hence, their fear of losing their existence and believing in an eternal journey to secure their existence. They are wrestling with the tension between the promise and the peril of this great journey. They fear evolving, as they may render themselves beyond their recognition. The answer to the ultimate conundrum struck some super-intelligent minds without fear of ending their existence. Mingling the two mutually exclusive ideas of losing and not losing one's existence after holding the absolute tune and identifying what emerges from the mixture works wonders. When ideas from two different scientific streams overlap, new inventions are created for universal benefit. Let us consider both the second law of thermodynamics and the theory of evolution. From the second law of thermodynamics, we come to arrive at an arrow of time. Everything changes, and this change occurs in a unique direction from a more ordered state to something more disordered and less structured. Everything is worn out in everyday life. Weather and the environment crumble stones and bricks, reducing abandoned houses to piles of rubble. They never inspired the creation of a neat brick wall from debris. Physicists mathematically describe this feature by using the concept of entropy. Thus, we can say that the universe has a direction, and time has an arrow. However, when we look at life, we may find the idea that the arrow of time is violated. Living organisms, such as trees, fish, or humans, take simple chemical elements and compounds and rearrange them into highly ordered complex structures. Darwin's theory of evolution, to put it simply, is just a journey of a simple organism to a more complex variety, and one may find it in defiance of the arrow of time. When ideas from different fields of science overlap, they are extrapolated to brilliant ideas. From another perspective, universal consciousness needs to grow and advance to survive. This need for growth comes with a massive appetite for power. This idea of appetite for power is ever-increasing, which is evident from the instances of great spiritual masters taking birth to keep their spiritual records intact and enhance their power. Thus, it behaves as a power-hungry entity. It expands, evolves, and attempts to influence everything in its path.