

The Evolutionary Model

The entire evolutionary process of creation is a spiral movement, going in cycles. There are innumerable points in this spiral and progress in the vertical direction is achieved at each point. However, one has to make a whole round to return once more to almost the same point, but at a slightly higher level. Occidental minds are now inventing ways to minimize unnecessary effort in spiral movement and achieve vertical height, minimizing delays with minimum effort and maximum benefit. The type of humanity we see around us is an unfruitful attempt at the natural order. The ultimate elevation is possible in many other ways. The outdated process of liberation of the soul should be eliminated in the future, just as there have been other abortive species that have disappeared in the course of universal history. New beginnings often come in disguise after painful endings. Pain may be inevitable, but suffering is optional. Pain causes unwise people to suffer and wise people learn. Every pain has a lesson to teach, and wisdom helps one find the teachings behind it. The activities of greedy people, firmly attached to the world, make us unhappy. People with less wisdom calibrate others with the yardstick of worldly wealth. There is a higher form of hierarchy, which is the hierarchy of the spirit. The hierarchy followed in society is unjust, primitive, devoid of logic, and evolves from a serious lack of wisdom. Life is a divine pilgrimage, for wise men, there are no roadside inns to take rest, wise souls are always on an eternal journey, they are marching tirelessly to the infinite domain of eternal truth & absolute bliss, the ultimate destination of every soul ever has been and ever will be. Souls can be salvaged, and they have been salvaged by spiritual greats in the past and will be salvaged many more times in the future. However, no one has ever considered the conversion of the soul. Even according to the highest spiritual practices, converting the soul is beyond the scope of universal law. The law of the universe supports the gradual transformation of the soul; however, outright conversion is not permitted. Through the process of transformation, one can change the appearance, conduct, and other hues of a soul, but its intrinsic properties or the fundamental elements with which the soul is constituted can never be altered; in that case, its identity is lost, which is not permissible by universal laws. One of the strangest specialties ever possible is to convert the soul to a greater degree without wiping the primary identity. The process is conquered and includes what is ahead, and what is behind, and conquer, and includes all that is in between. There is nothing called the other shore because our existence permeates both shores. This unprecedented capability is still debated and dissected among spiritual greats near and far.

The maker has been confronted, and He by His sweet whims decides not to construct our house again, the almost invincible hard structures are broken, and the bricks are being shattered. The very existence of this transcending world will no longer be touched by worldly desires; it is soaring to greater heights, high enough to get the taste of that elusive eternal peace, beyond struggle and suffering, after a long slumber of millions of births.
